... Everybody said that the history of the Chinese working on the CPR was a “blood and tears” story of hardship and suffering, of mistreatment and humiliation, that had nothing to do with glory; and no one wanted to re-open these old wounds, for fear of offending mainstream Canadian society... Second, the first generation of Chinese unceasingly pushed their children to embrace the society of their new country. They were ashamed and did not want to tell their children anything of their involvement in the construction of the railway.
